

Your Family's Quick-Start Guide to ESTATE PLANNING

Talking about one's legacy can be discomfoting. Estate planning, after all, is primarily about what will happen to your physical and financial assets when you are no longer around.

1. What is estate planning
2. Intestacy (and why it can be a problem)
3. Guardianship
4. Wills
5. Trusts
6. Healthcare Directives & Living Wills
7. Getting Started
8. Working With An Attorney

But in my experience as an estate planning attorney, I've come to see that once my clients understand why estate planning is important, they get over any discomfort about the process.

Why?

When you create your estate plan, you do it out of love. Having a plan means that your loved ones are exactly the ones who will inherit your hard-earned wealth. If your last act is to ensure the security and well-being of those you care about, then you're going to need an estate plan. Seen in this light, estate planning can be empowering. Not depressing.

One other powerful result of proper estate planning is that it ensures that the taxation of your estate can be minimized. Done strategically, your estate plan could provide for your heirs to inherit the maximum that the law permits.

Lastly, as you age, you may become less able to care for yourself, or perhaps become entirely unable to do so. An estate plan that includes health directives and powers of attorney can help ensure that your wishes regarding your own well-being are respected.

This short guide covers just the basics of estate planning, so it's not meant to be exhaustive. But it will help you take that all-important first step.

As the father of two young people, my appeal to you is to do the right thing for your loved ones. If you commit to one thing this year, let it be your estate plan. The fullness of one's life is never completed until the consequences of one's demise are responsibly settled as well.

Sincerely,

Robert

1. WHAT IS ESTATE PLANNING?

Estate planning is the process by which you create legal documents that set out your wishes when you are no longer around or no longer able when still living to implement them. For most of us, estate planning makes clear our intentions as to who inherits your estate (physical and financial assets) when we've passed. A comprehensive estate plan can also include your instructions on what is to be done in the event of your incapacitation i.e. when you can no longer make decisions for yourself or act as regards your well-being. Lastly, an estate plan provides for the minimization of estate taxes that have to be paid upon any transfer of wealth to heirs.

A typical estate plan should include:

- a will that is the primary document regulating your wishes as regards inheritance and guardianship
- a trust that relates to protecting assets for the benefit of yourself and/or specific persons
- a healthcare directive and proxy that specifies your intent as regards decisions on your physical well-being and end-of-life arrangements respectively
- a power of attorney that enables a trusted Agent to make financial decisions for you in the event that you are incapacitated
- for parents with minor children, a temporary guardianship document that names a trusted adult to care for minor children in the event of your incapacity

If your last act is to ensure the security and well-being of those you care about, then you're going to need an estate plan to get that done.

You don't need to have all of the above – it all depends on your assets and your specific situation and wishes. But even single people should have a will and advance directives because all of us want to make sure the fruits of our life's labor go to the people and organizations we care about. And also, that we always retain our independence as individuals.

2. INTESTACY

When you die without a will, you die "intestate". Which means that your family and heirs have to endure a prolonged probate process. Probate is the process whereby the legal courts distribute all estates – with or without a will. When the situation of intestacy arises, it almost always means a delay in the distribution of the estate because the court – in the absence of a will – has to become your estate planner. Judges need more time to consider the facts and then apply the law. In New York State, the laws of distribution in intestacy are perhaps one of the most complicated in the country. Having a will means you avoid this serious challenge.

So, without a will, someone else (the state) decides who gets what and how much. The statutes rarely accomplish results that truly match your own wishes. In New York, your spouse receives $50,000 and one-half of the remainder of your estate. Your children receive the other half, even as minors.

The other key thing to consider is this: if your family is entirely reliant on your estate to generate income, the absence of a will can be a traumatic experience for them if they do not have sufficient funds to live on. In New York, it can take several months to probate a will, and certainly more time is needed to distribute an estate that does not have a will.

In intestacy, the lack of a will can be complicated by claims to some or all of your assets. While this may be unlikely in most cases, it can prolongs the process and added litigation can further muddy the waters.

*Not having a will can be a prolonged, stressful and costly process for your family.
Why put them through it?*

One last thing: when the courts has decided on distribution, it will appoint someone to be the "administrator" (aka "Personal Representative") of your estate. It can be someone you know (such as a relative or friend) who could agree to take up the responsibilities. In the absence of this, the court will appoint someone (likely a professional like a lawyer). Administrators are also entitled to a fee, which comes out of the estate assets. (note: where you do have a will, your administrator is called an "Executor").

Having a will is likely to ensure that your assets get to the people you love quickly and without incident or stress. Probating a will is generally an inexpensive and smooth process, provided you've got it properly drafted and executed. Dealing with intestacy should simply be avoided. And it can be – with a properly executed will.

3. GUARDIANSHIP

This is perhaps the most sensitive topic for most of my clients: the issue of who will take care of their kids should they pass on prematurely i.e. before the kids are of legal age. For some people, it's an easy choice: their own parents and/or siblings will be guardians for their kids, or even very close friends or other relatives. But the truth is few of us have actually thought deeply about this issue. If you (as a single-parent) or you and your spouse were to die before your kids were grown, who would raise them with the best care, love and wisdom? Having gone through this process ourselves, my wife and I know that it's not an easy question to answer. And even when you've settled on one or a few people, you have to ask them whether they would take on this responsibility. It may not always be the answer you think it already is. A conversation with your preferred guardians should start as soon as you have kids. And if you are a single parent, arranging for proper legal guardianship is all the more urgent.

Who will raise your kids when something unexpected were to happen to you and your spouse ... at the same time?

The issue of guardianship can be addressed through the use of the following:

- A Guardianship Clause in a Will
- A Standby Guardianship
- A Designation of Person in Parental Relation

In a Guardianship Clause of a Will, a parent names a guardian and an alternative to raise his or her child or children in case of the parent's death. The benefit of this is immense. Naming a guardian is a major step in assuring that a child is raised by a close and trusted friend or family member whom the parent believes will best raise your child or children Naming a guardian also has the effect of limiting conflict over that very question because guardianship clauses are given great weight by courts in guardianship proceedings.

Parents can also add an additional layer of protection for their children by creating a Standby Guardianship document. This type of guardianship document is useful if a parent will be away on travel and becomes stranded because of war or natural disaster, or if the parent becomes incapacitated or even dies. The Standby Guardianship gives the named guardian the right to act as a child's "parent" in the absence or incapacity of the legal parent or guardian. It does not take away the rights of a parent, rather it provides the standby guardian the same rights as the parent. The Standby Guardianship offers the parent flexibility because it enables a parent to establish a termination date, and can be done through writing if certain formalities are observed. The temporary guardianship generally lasts for sixty days before permission of a court is required to continue the guardianship or at the death of the parent.

Finally, if a parent will be out of the country or away on an extended trip, he or she might utilize a Designation of Person in Parental Relation as a method of ensuring that a competent adult has the authority to make decisions related to a child's school or health while the parent is away. The use of HIPPA authorization in conjunction with the Designation may be considered for most effective use.

The use of guardianship documents and clauses can be used in conjunction with other estate planning documents to provide for as many contingencies as possible.

4. WILLS

A will is what we lawyers call a "testamentary" document. "Testamentary" because it is a declaration of and testimonial to your free-willed wishes that governs the document. A will is the most common type of estate planning document. A properly drafted will can accomplish the following for you:

- The people who receive your assets are the ones you intend as recipients
- Your Executor or Personal Representative is a person you trust for his/her honesty AND expertise to carry out the disposition/transfer/preservation of your estate per your specific intentions
- Your children have a Guardian of your choice

Of course, it sounds very simple and for most people, will-making is indeed a straightforward process. Sometimes, the simplest and shortest paragraphs of legalese suffices. The Internet has many templates that give an idea what your will could look like. But remember that not everything you intend can be operational in law so it's always good to have a lawyer look over the final version. Remember too that there is a process of witnessing (attestation) that makes the will valid. Make sure you do that correctly too as requirements may vary from state to state (note: estate law is entirely within the purview of state law; there is no "federal" estate law even as there are federal taxes to be paid upon inheritance).

One important thing to note as a spouse: marriage operates to some extent outside the law of wills. If you own real estate or any other property with your spouse in a joint tenancy, that operates by law to confer full ownership of assets to your surviving spouse. You cannot terminate this "law of survivorship" by providing for someone else to inherit your share of the joint tenancy via your will. As most couples own their family home jointly, this is one area that must be clearly understood by married people who may agree to leave some of their real estate to children from former marriages, for example. Talk to your spouse about this.

5. TRUSTS

Trusts are highly complex legal instruments and there are quite a few types of trusts. For our purposes here, I'll talk about trusts that are most common when it comes to families. For most families, trusts are used primarily to hold assets outside the probate process (i.e. assets that are not distributed via your will). The reason is two-fold: to minimize estate taxes (since probate deals with the estate and any transfer of estate assets incur federal and state tax) and to ensure that some assets continue to exist or be managed per your wishes beyond your demise.

Estate Planning is also about tax savings – minimize estate tax to ensure as much as possible passes to your heirs. You can do this through the use of trusts.

There are two types of trusts you need to know about as parents:

- Irrevocable Trusts
- Revocable Trusts

The difference between "irrevocable" and "revocable" is that in the latter case, you can change your instructions that pertain to the trust. You can't make any changes to an irrevocable trust – it's "set in stone". Irrevocable trusts are usually used for life insurance – an ILIT (Irrevocable Life Insurance Trust) ensures that your family not only receives the full monetary benefit of your life insurance, but they also pay no taxes on such benefits. Without an ILIT, they will get less money from your life policies as they will have to pay taxes on the amount received from your insurance carriers.

When does one need an ILIT? When your estate (including real estate, family business, investments, retirement funds, pensions, life insurance and valuables such as art or other collectibles) exceeds $3MM (for a single) or $6MM (for married couples) – at the federal tax level. It's best to talk to your tax advisor about this. Note that estate taxes even at the state level for New York isn't low – it's 16% (as of 2015) for assets valued at more than $1MM. This a very low threshold, meaning that if you own a home and have retirement accounts that total more than $1MM, you're highly likely to have to pay that 16%. That means less wealth to your heirs.

Another common form of irrevocable trust relates to protecting assets thereunder from creditors and even divorcing spouses. This is particularly relevant when you have one or several businesses.

Revocable trusts are typically used to secure both spouses' federal and/or state estate tax exclusions. Upon the death of a spouse, revocable trust assets can be used to fund a family trust (also known as a “credit shelter”, or “Bypass” or “A / B” trust). Within a family trust, your transfer of assets for the benefit of your surviving spouse incurs less taxation (the “spousal exemption”).

One type of trust that is all-important for parents with special needs children is the Special Needs Trust. The tricky thing about this area of trust law is that you may land up depriving your child of government benefits if you set up such a trust without in-depth planning. So if you are going to do so, work with an attorney who is specifically experienced in Special Needs Trusts.

Trusts can also be set up for minor children and even your grown adult children. The point is to ensure the proper management of your assets such that your children receive what you intend, without rapid depletion that will jeopardize their financial security. Remember also that while you wish to protect your assets to benefit your loved ones, sometimes it's better to leave it to a trustee who is experienced, impartial and savvy. Even adult children can sometimes be too irresponsible with money left to them by their parents.

All trusts requires grantors (you), beneficiaries (your loved ones) and a trustee (a person legally empowered to administer the trust). Your choice of trustee should be based on someone who has the expertise to carry out the workings of the trust, and the integrity to meet his/her fiduciary responsibilities. Most people choose their trusted legal or tax advisors to be trustees. It's not an easy job for the lay person.

6. HEALTHCARE DIRECTIVES & LIVING WILLS

Having a will and/or a trust isn't a complete estate plan. You should also plan for incapacity.

I always include this topic in my discussions for clients. It's just as much about doing what's right for your well- being as it is about doing what's good for your loved ones. Imagine being in the position of having to decide for your spouse whether to terminate life-saving medical efforts. For your children, it's just as hard if you are a single parent and they have to make that decision for you. Remember what I said about estate planning being about love?

You can free yourself and your loved ones from deep anxiety and stress by setting up legal documents that address the situation where you can no longer make decisions pertaining to your physical and financial well-being. Even if your spouse or family member knows you very well, it's always good to talk about your wishes as an individual before you start working on the legalities.

To plan for incapacity, you should consider the following:

- A Power of Attorney
- A Health Care Proxy
- Other Health Care Directives: e.g. Living Will

A Power of Attorney can have very deep and wide influence on your financial life: the person who has POA will have authority to make decisions on business transactions, including banking, real estate and investments.

Imagine putting your loved ones in a position where they have to decide when you die, and how you die?

Would your spouse be best placed to have POA in the event of your incapacity? Remember that POA is less about your physical well-being than your financial security so having the right expertise is important. There's also the Durable Power of Attorney. This one is even more powerful: it is for the chosen person to make all decisions for you when you are in need of guardianship due to incapacity. For this, make doubly sure that the chances of abuse of power are realistically absent.

A Health Care Proxy is really a Durable POA for just Health Care decisions. The New York state government has made this legal document available online (see www.health.ny.gov). Make sure you get it witnessed, but the real question is who you want to make the decisions for you.

It's important to note that a Living Will is not the same as a Health Care Proxy. The former provides specific instructions about health care decisions. You may put such instructions on your New York Health Care Proxy form – it will help your "proxy" to make decisions for you ("proxy" refers to both the person, and to the legal document). The Health Care Proxy allows you to choose someone you trust to make health care decisions on your behalf. Unlike a Living Will, a Health Care Proxy does not require that you know in advance all the decisions that may arise. Instead, your health care agent can interpret your wishes as medical circumstances change and can make decisions you could not have known would have to be made.

What are these decisions? The most common example is if you wish to have artificial life support terminated in the event that you are unconscious and there's no reasonable hope of your recovery, your agent can direct your doctors to discontinue any treatments that unnecessarily prolong your life. I would recommend that your spouse or most trusted relative or friend be your agent in your health care proxy. They may already know your wishes, but having it in writing makes a painful situation a little easier to bear.

7. GETTING STARTED

In the above sections, I talked a bit about probate – the distribution of assets when you have a will and when you die without one (i.e. intestate). There's also something called non-probate assets i.e. assets that fall outside the legal requirements of needing a will or other estate planning documents to ensure proper inheritance. For most families, the typical non-probate assets include:

- Proceeds (aka "death benefit") of a life insurance policy (or policies) where the beneficiaries do not include your estate and are instead your spouse and/or children
- Balances (funds) in your retirement accounts – such as IRA (Individual Retirement Account) and other Retirement Plans (such as your 401(k), or 403(b)) and your tax-deferred annuities

This is the key advantage of non-probate assets – if you make clear beneficiary designations, all the assets pass to your beneficiaries without the need for probate. So if you have life insurance, your spouse and kids need only provide your insurance carrier with your policy details and the insurance benefit will be paid out to them directly. This kind of cash flow can prove to be a crucial buffer for your family when the rest of your estate is going through probate. For example, while your estate is going through probate, your family will have the liquidity they need to meet mortgage payments, school fees, living expenses, healthcare insurance etc..

This is something you can do for your loved ones now without need for a lawyer. Make or update your beneficiary designations (updates are important especially if you're remarried and/or have kids from your current marriage).

Once you get your non-probate assets attended to, then the more detailed thinking must follow: make a list of all your probate-able assets (inventory), and who you want to leave them to and why (intentions). I have one client who is a single mother but also the sole caregiver for an aged friend. That aged friend was provided for too. And if you have a business, that is an asset as well. In fact, as a business owner, that's an additional aspect of your estate planning (talk to your business partners about succession planning and exit strategies with the guidance of a law firm). See our website for more thorough questionnaire that you can use to for this exercise.

9. WORKING WITH A LAWYER

I like to joke with people I meet that we sometimes spend dozens of hours planning for a family vacation, but hardly or no time at all on estate planning that protects our loved ones. The irony is that I am also deeply serious: if anything were to happen to you during a family vacation (or to your spouse as well), it could be a real crisis for your family. One that could negatively impact the course of their lives.

It's natural to be uncomfortable talking about death and the dwindling of one's life. But it can be easier if you talk to someone who doesn't see it as all doom and gloom. I see my work as something fulfilling because I help my clients and their families live with a considerable amount of peace-of-mind, and help bring them to where they are supposed to be. My point is this: work with attorneys who can take you to that comfort level where you start feeling that the estate planning process is empowering and not something to be fearful or squeamish about. It's a serious matter, but we don't have to lose our good cheer even as we are hard-headed about it.

Isn't it odd that some people spend more time planning for a vacation ... than planning for the protection and well-being of their loved ones?

That said, you should ask these questions when deciding whether to work with a law firm:

- Is estate planning their main area of practice, and if so, for how many years? Five years is a good benchmark.
- Can he/she provide a proposal that lists pricing, work to be delivered and timeline for completion?

- What do client testimonials say about them? Are they willing for you to talk to their clients about the latter's experience with you?
- Are they flexible i.e. they won't "nickel and dime" you? You should respect and pay professionals for their time and good work, but avoid those who are not willing to be flexible.

One last thing: I have no problems with people who prefer the Do-It-Yourself approach. The Internet has many good websites offering standard forms and basic explanations. So the question is this: is your own situation just a "standard" one? If all you have is non-probate assets, then you may not even need a will. But if you have assets that need to go through the probate process, and you have minor children, things could get tricky. And there's the issue of planning for incapacity as you enter your later years.

You could, of course, DIY your estate planning and get an attorney to review the documents, but to get it right could mean spending as much as if you had used the attorney in the first place. My advice is this: go the DIY route only if you are perfectly sure you aren't taking high risks with your well-being and that of your loved ones; if your situation is in any way uncommon, you'll need the drafting expertise of an experienced attorney.

In law, "the devil is in the details". Lawyers are trained to not miss the woods for the trees, and vice versa. For lay persons, that which is often seemingly harmless and ordinary can throw the entire situation in disarray when overlooked or done wrongly. Plus, developments take place in the courts all the time and even in legislation, so you should make sure to stay on top of that as well if you prefer to work independently. In many things, we can afford to be penny-wise-pound-foolish.

Estate planning isn't one of them.
